

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 8, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumer long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

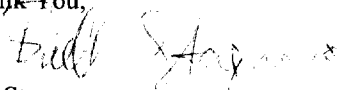

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

Bill Stagnaro
2346 Franklin Street
San Francisco, CA 94123

January 8, 1998

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumer long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "Cynthia Kno".

Cynthia Kno
1969 Grove St.
San Francisco, CA 94117

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 8, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W. - Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumer long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

Handwritten signature of Kimberly Curtis in black ink.

Kimberly Curtis
1969 Grove St.
San Francisco, CA 94117

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 14, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd

List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "Cory Thomas".

35868 Cabral Drive
Fremont, CA. 94536

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 14, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is

No. of Copies rec'd 0
1 2 3 4 5 6

RECEIVED
JAN 2 1994
FCC
only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

CAORON Olan
17235 ROBERTA ST
CASTRO VALLEY CA
94546

January 14, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W. - Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Don Olson". The signature is fluid and cursive, with a large initial "D" and "O".

Don Olson
1015 Pierce St. #305
SF, CA 94115

RECEIVED

JAN 21 1998

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 8, 1998

FCC FILE

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W. - Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumers of long distance services, both residential and small business, rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services they need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

No. of Copies rec'd 0
List A B C D E

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

Nicholas J. Solomon
7210 Blake St.
El Cerrito, CA 94530

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 8, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas

Secretary

Federal Communications Commission

1919 M Street, N.W. - Room 222

Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;

Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a devoted and loyal consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumer long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

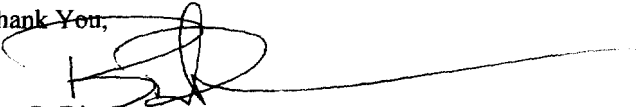

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

Roy P. Dimalanta
640 Whippoorwill Ct.
Walnut Creek, CA 94598

January 8, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W. - Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumers of long distance services, both residential and small business, rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services they need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

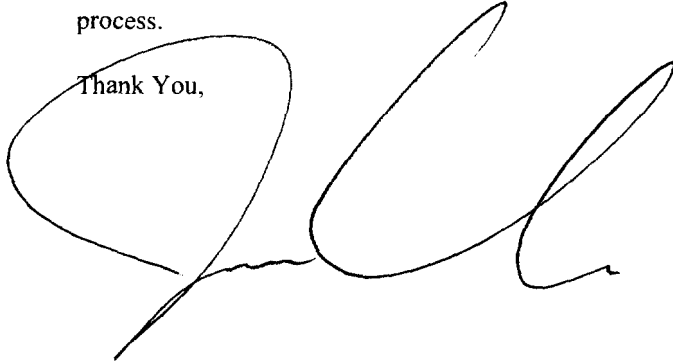

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. This is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short of meeting consumers' need.

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A large, stylized handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read 'JCHU'.

JASON CHU
2150 OXFORD ST #79
BERKELEY, CA 94704

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 8, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

Consumer long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read "Kathleen O'Connell", is written over the printed name.

Kathleen O'Connell
4781 Mintwood Drive
Concord, CA 94521

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

January 14, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

A handwritten signature in dark ink, appearing to be "Michael J. ...", written in a cursive style.

RECEIVED

JAN 21 1998

January 14, 1998

FCC RECEIVED

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is only available to a carrier's existing customers and therefore is unavailable to new customers who are comparison shopping and trying to decide between carriers and services. Second, the advertising and promotional materials provided by carriers are rarely detailed enough to enable a customer to make service-to-service and carrier-to-carrier comparisons. Moreover, these materials certainly will not be specific enough to allow consumers to detect--let alone support--a claim of carrier misconduct at the FCC. In short, the information available publicly without a specific Commission requirement will fall far short to meeting consumers' need.

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E

I fully support the Petition and urge the Commission to promptly reinstate the public information disclosure requirement for widely available services. Only in this way can the Commission ensure that consumers have access to information crucial to both consumer choice and the consumer complaint process.

Thank You,

ERNE LOPEZ
1105 VISTA POINTE CIR
SAN RAMON, CA
94583

January 14, 1998

Ms. Magalie Roman Salas
Secretary
Federal Communications Commission
1919 M Street, N.W.- Room 222
Washington, DC 20554

DOCKET FILE COPY ORIGINAL

Re: Policy and Rules Concerning the Interstate, Interexchange Marketplace;
Implementation of Section 254 (g) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended: CC Docket No. 96-61

Dear Ms. Salas:

On December 4, 1997, the Telecommunications Management Information Systems Coalition and The Utility Reform Network filed a Petition for Further Reconsideration of the Federal Communications Commission's decision to eliminate the requirement for long distance carriers to provide pricing and service information regarding widely available services to the public. I support this Petition.

Being a consumer of telecommunications products & services I find it difficult to make an informed decision on which carrier I should choose. I found the Salestar Web Pricer helpful and informative in choosing my long distance carrier. Without public disclosure services like this would disappear.

In October 1996, the FCC adopted rules that prohibit long distance carriers from filing their tariffs for domestic long distance service with the FCC. At the same time, the Commission noted that consumers continue to need information about the rates, terms and conditions of long distance service. As a result, the FCC required carriers to make such information available to the public. In August 1997, the Commission inexplicably changed its position and eliminated the public disclosure requirement for mass market services even though no party requested such a change. Despite the FCC's elimination of the information disclosure requirement, a strong need for publicly available information regarding long distance services remains.

As a consumer of long distance services, I rely on publicly available pricing information in order to make informed decisions about the telecommunications services I need. As even the FCC recognized in its October 1996 order, a public disclosure requirement promotes the public interest by making it easier for consumers to compare service offerings. Thousand of long distance calling plans and services are now available to the public. If consumers are to be able to make any meaningful distinctions between these plans, they must have access to detailed and accurate information regarding the plans. The only way to ensure that consumers have access to the plans that they are interested in, as opposed to the particular plan that a carrier happens to be promoting at a particular time, is through an FCC-mandated public disclosure requirement. The FCC should not deny consumers access to this important information.

Consumers traditionally have served as the FCC's watchdogs over certain practices of the long distance industry. For example, the Communications Act prohibits carriers from charging consumers in rural and other high- cost areas higher rates than those charged to consumers in urban and other lower-cost areas. Absent the public availability of pricing information, however, consumers will be hard pressed to detect such impermissible price discrimination in the first instance. Moreover, even if consumers are able to determine that a violation has occurred, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to adequately support their complaints to the FCC.

The Commission suggests that billing and other advertising and promotional materials will be available to serve the informational needs of consumers. The is far from true. First, billing information, by definition, is

No. of Copies rec'd _____
List A B C D E